

Why does good judgement give you good wisdom?

“Judging yourself rightly” means that a person has grown within themselves and knows how to be honest with themselves. It takes a person a while to understand themselves. Sometimes they never do and sometimes they do. Having good judgement is knowing what a person stands for and who they are. Sometimes people are afraid of knowing themselves, so it’s much more easier to judge others. A person can act in a specific way to someone because of the way they judge or see them, but that wouldn’t affect the person that’s judging in any ways. Therefore, judging others is a simple action. A wise person is able to understand who they are and is able to see his/her mistakes, not only others. People should observe and discover themselves before they act in a specific way. A wise person should be able to take time and effort to get to know themselves. Right judgement comes from a person’s “right” self. No one should attempt to judge someone else if they are barely aware of who they are themselves.
